

Joe's struggle. What would have been a simple act of justice in such a case, was perverted into a crime.

Through the long morning he worked steadily, and before noon had earned enough to buy a loaf of bread and meat; with these he slipped into his little bedroom early in the afternoon—though not before he had discovered that it was well filled with handkerchiefs, and that a tattered address to SIMON ARCHER, No. — West Forty-second street, "thought, that must be the man," thought Joe. "I'll ask my teacher what to do."

Full of this idea he started off down the street, early for him, for he was thinking "What do I do next?" When one clapped him on the shoulder, and a pleasant voice said: "How are you getting on, sir?"

Joe looked up; it was his teacher.

"Oh I'm so glad to see you, I want to ask you what to do; and he told all about it, finding the pocket-book, and the name in it, and how to do next, and what to say, and how to keep his temptation to keep it."

"Well, my boy, you've done nobby; now would advise you to take it to the man, and see if it be long to him, and if not I will advance it to you. Here is my address, you wish to see me at any time, so good by he said."

It was late in the afternoon when he started for Mr. Archer's, as he knew his business men were not at home until the day was not long in finding the place, a half a score brown stone front, and he felt a little timid as he rang the bell. "Can I see Mr. Archer?" he asked of the servant.

"What can you wish, sir? I'd like to know?" said the girl crossly, glancing down at his patched clothes.

"I want to speak with him, if you please," replied Joe with some spirit.

"Well, I'll see."

Joe waited on the steps, and in a moment the door opened, looking elderly man came and inquired his errand.

"Have you lost anything, sir?" asked Joe cautiously.

"Well, I should rather think I had; but what do you know about it, boy? have you found a pocket book?"

"Yes, sir," said Joe, in a place descriptive of his feelings.

"I think this must be it," said Joe, grasping it tightly in his pocket.

"Come in, and we'll see about this while I did you find it? I want to know all about it."

Joe told his story in a straightforward manner, and Mr. Archer listened in a surprised way.

"Now, my boy what sent you here? Was there a letter in it directed to Simon Archer, and five hundred dollars in bank bills?"

"Yes, sir, all right," and Joe handed it over.

Mr. Archer, counted over the money—not a dollar gone, then he glanced at Joe's torn and old patched clothes.

"Well, sir, I am glad to see that you are an honest boy, and if you will come to my counting room, No. — Broadway, I can give you a place where you can do better than you seem to be doing now; and here is something for present want," (handing him a reward of five dollars).

"Thank you, sir; I didn't expect any reward, I only did what I thought was right."

"That's it; always stick to that, and you will be sure to prosper," said Mr. Archer briskly; "now, my lad, I shall look for you in a day or two."

Joe carried a light heart home that night, and he told the story to his aunt, and Elsie, they could scarcely credit it; twenty dollars was quite a little fortune to them.

Well, the result of it all was, Joe got good situation; and is now in a fair way to make an active, upright business man. Aunt Hannah and Elsie are seeing brighter days, and all are learning to put their trust in God, and to be cheerful while Dick Dugan is spending a few months now in the House of Correction.

A Drop too Much.

One fine morning, last summer, a chieftain from the country, one would suppose judging from the title of the harness, was sauntering on the Fifth Avenue, on his way to the great show—the Crystal palace. His whole appearance, actions and conduct marked him a sure victim, in the eyes of the drooping fraternity; and just about the time, too, one of them was around; and after a judiciously replied the trifle.

"Suddenly seizing an apparently well filled pocket-book upon the ground, at the feet of the intended victim, at the same time touching his foot in a manner to attract his attention—

"Ah, sir, your pocket-book—just dropped it," he exclaimed.

"My pocket-book," asked 'country,' as surprised as you can be.

"Yes, sir, your pocket-book—just found at your feet," continued the dropper.

"Look a here, stranger, that ain't my pocket-book, nohow," persisted the country man.

"Not yours?" says dropper.

"No, sir, I've got mine safe enough in my pocket," replied the countryman.

"Beg your pardon, sir; I really thought you dropped it. It is evidently a well filled one—contains a large amount of money—no doubt a large reward will be offered if I," says dropper.

"Yes! No doubt of it," put in the country man.

"Well, now," continued Sharp, "as I intended to leave the city to day, won't you take the pocket-book, and—"

"Oh, yes, certainly; I'll take it," eagerly answered the ruralite, at the same time extending his huge hand to receive it.

"Now, you know, as there will be a handsome reward offered for it, suppose you give me five dollars, and then you can call it your get."

"Ye-e! I'll do it. Here's a ten dollar bill. You get five!" asked the variant.

"Yes, sir, here it is—city bank bill—promptly answered dropper.

"Well, now, I don't know anything about your get; suppose you give me five dollars in silver," suggested the country man.

"I would, my dear sir, with pleasure, if I had it," says dropper.

"Well, haven't you got gold? inquire of your country."

"Yes, I believe I have, and taking from his purse a genuine five dollar gold piece, he gave it to the countryman.

"Good morning, sir," says he.

"Good morning," returned the supposed victim, and as the dropper departed, probably checking to himself over the speculation he flattered himself he made, our country friend exclaimed adieu to the dropper.

"Gussus no! Not a bad spec for one morning—got rid of a counterfeiter, got good five and a new pocket book. Try to get on again, old fellow, won't ye?"

Misstatement.

From the Sunday Journal.

The enclosed notice is long file and so the poetry:

MACASSAR'S OUTRIDE.

The following marriage notice appears in the Buffalo (N. Y.) Commercial Advertiser:

"On the 25th inst., by Rev. E. Kendall, John Whisker, and Miss Lizzie Mamill, all of this city."

A hairy face is beauty's dread,
For wullock L. would risk her
She rose this morn a smooth faced maid
And went to bed with Whiskers.

Horse.—Any thing that a horse can touch with his nose without being harmed he does not fear. Therefore, the hand, halter, bridle, blanket, raddle, harness, unbranded buffalo robe, or whatever is brought in proximity to him, should be first touched by that sensitive organ.

A knowledge of this important fact, as ascertained by the Sunday at the Buffalo, is the main secret of his success in standing horses. His strap method of training horses is useless except in cases of aggravated ill temper; and such cases are usually the result of mismanagement.
